Royal visitors at Dyffryn Gardens

By Joan Andrews

Photos by Dimitris Legakis for the NT

TRH Prince Charles and the Duchess of Cornwall devote a short period each year staying in the Principality while visiting various organisations and places of local interest. Such visits are not announced until the last minute so we were unable to inform members of the Friends.

On 1st July of this year they first visited Llantwit Major and then made a call at Dyffryn. They were met by Justin Albert (Director, National Trust in Wales), Gerry Donovan (Site Curator) and representing the Queen – The Lord Lieutenant of South Glamorgan - Dr Peter Beck.

On the day Dyffryn looked its best. The sun was shining on immaculate borders, our new buggy was on show, police presence was large but not too obtrusive as sniffer dogs viewed the garden from a whole new olfactory perspective.

The Astronomy Society had set up their telescopes on the lawn and were much enjoyed by off duty police. The croquet club in immaculate whites were demonstrating their sport and the apiarists had a stand by the panel garden.

The visitors were first shown round the house and met many of the volunteers. Some local school children demonstrated the facilities for younger visitors. The royal guests then strolled along the long walk and on behalf of the Friends I had the honour of being introduced.

The gardeners and volunteers showed the visitors round the garden rooms before they ended their visit by attending a reception by the Welsh Historic Garden Trust in the Cory Education Centre.

The New Buggy

By Val Caple

The Friends Committee agreed to offer matched funding for the NT to purchase a buggy which will be driven by volunteers to transport visitors around the garden. In recent years Dyffryn Gardens have hired buggies when events were taking place but this buggy will be waiting at the entrance gate most days

Glyn Jones' Guided Tour

By John Wallace

On a glorious July morning the Friends of Dyffryn Gardens met Glyn Jones for a guided tour of the gardens.

Glyn is the Garden and Countryside Manager at Hidcote Manor. In this position, he is responsible for steering a major restoration project, researching the essence of Hidcote from its early 20th century heyday, and returning the property to its former glory.

Glyn was born and raised in Rochdale but his father was from Anglesey, hence his name and his love for Wales. His interest in gardening dates from his childhood and he remembers lifting paving slabs in his back garden and sowing seeds or planting in the space provided.

He left school early and started as an apprentice on municipal gardens in the North of England. After graduating from the Royal Botanic Garden in Edinburgh in 1986, Glyn worked as an intern in the Forestry Reserve of Illinois at the Brookfield Zoo. He returned to the UK in 1987 and worked alongside Penelope Hobhouse at the Tintinhull House Garden in Somerset for five years. He was then promoted to Head Gardener/Property Manager at the Peckover House in East Anglia before accepting his current position at Hidcote. He has worked in horticulture for over 40 years, including 14 years at Hidcote.

He is presently seconded to Dyffryn Gardens for a year as a consultant where he hopes to bring some of the experience gained at Hidcote to continue the excellent restoration work already underway here.

In general, his objective is to produce a documented strategic plan that outlines how to recreate the spirit of Reginald Cory's garden progressively and in a dynamic way in order to attract increasing numbers of visitors year by year. Parts of Cory's gardens are about 100 years old so much work will have to be carried out. However, this must happen gradually in order to maintain and increase visitor interest.

Glyn took us on a tour of the garden in order to illustrate some of the issues he faces using some of Edith Adie's paintings as references. On our way to the Panel Garden, Glyn pointed out the multicoloured Yews to the side of the house (not Cory's but later Local Authority plantings) which were intended to imitate mushrooms with a narrow base and flattish tops. At some stage it might be desirable to do some replanting to recreate this effect. At the Panel Garden we looked at other Yew trees and noticed how they had grown out of shape and become so large that the views toward the house were masked. Replanting should perhaps be considered with smaller examples to preserve the formality without impairing the view.

We were then joined by two American DNA researchers who were looking at the DNA of the Acer Griseum in particular the Champion Tree and intend to compare this with samples from trees in China and the USA. They had to hurry away on their way to Westonbirt Arboretum but commented that they thought our Champion Paperbark Maple was probably the largest of its type in cultivation in the world.

We then went to look at our specimen Acer Griseum in the Arboretum. It was evident that this significant tree was not presented in a manner befitting its importance. Much too close by was an ancient Oak Tree. Each tree detracted from the other particularly in an environment where the undergrowth appeared wild. This demonstrated two issues for consideration. Should the Oak be sacrificed for the benefit of its illustrious neighbour or is it providing invaluable protection from the weather. Or would judicious pruning of the Oak be more appropriate. Also cost effective and environmentally friendly ways of managing the undergrowth might be considered to help improve the presentation of the trees.

Glyn and members

We then continued across the lawn to the far end of the canal and looked at the view along the canal back to the House and again noted the way the Yews were obscuring the view of the House that Cory wanted. The two Yews Trees with the golden tops by the croquet lawn were originally intended to represent candles but they are now hopelessly overgrown and misshapen. This emphasised the need to consider how best to manage all these trees for the future. Even now the House looked magnificent and provided a glorious punctuation mark to the view. However, looking the other way toward the south and over the empty pond it was very disappointing. Glyn thought Thomas Mawson wanted a similar punctuation mark in this direction, either with a building, or planting, or a grand water feature. But we are up against the newts yet again!

The Paved Court Garden was our next destination where Glyn showed us a prototype planter to replicate those illustrated in Edith Adie's painting. He described how the painting was being used to scale the planter sizes and future plantings in this area. We noted the exceptional quality of the prototype planter even though only softwood had been used in this example. Hardwood will be used in the final versions and the scale adjusted slightly.

Glyn explains his plans

Finally we visited the Reflecting Pool where Glyn showed us how various small Maples have been planted in recycled pots from elsewhere around the site. The problem here of course was the water quality which totally destroyed the reflecting qualities of the pool. Once again the newts reared their heads and because of them the thick blanketweed cannot be removed. Glyn was puzzled why the authorities in England and Wales should adopt such different approaches to the same conservation problem. At Hidcote they have been able to legally clear their ponds of blanket weed without threatening the newts who survive quite happily. Glyn was thanked by everybody for such an interesting and illuminating tour. We now look forward to his documented plan and to future developments in the gardens.

'rescue the rude, boisterous mountain children from their ungodliness.'

A tour around the garden at Wyndcliffe Court starts in front of the house with a series of stone walled terraces leading down to formal gardens, summer house and a pool. You then wander across the smooth bowling green or through a clipped yew lined path down to the informal woodland area and views of the Bristol Channel. To the west is the walled kitchen garden and old greenhouse. This area is planted with vegetables and more colourful plants.

At Veddw the car park is at the top of the site, so you first look down on a large parterre of grasses in a pattern of box hedges based on the local Tithe Map of 1842. Lower down the local rolling hills are reflected in the curvy hedges that lead to the reflecting pool. On the slope opposite is formal terracing leading up to an informal woodland area. As you walk down the steep path to the house you move into an area of colourful planting. Behind the house is the vegetable garden and orchard.

The designers of Veddw admit to be influenced by the Arts and Crafts tradition, but have added a quirky style of their own which we either loved or hated. Similarly challenging were the modern sculptures on display in the Wyndcliffe garden. I personally loved the mix of old and new in both gardens and am thinking where I could put one of the plants or sculptures which I admired.

Another successful trip – thank you Mary for discovering these gems

Wyndcliffe Court and Veddw House Gardens

By Val Caple

These two gardens have much in common, despite being designed nearly 70 years apart. Both have areas with a formal design with trimmed box and yew hedges or walls and areas of natural woodland landscape. Both have individual 'garden rooms' and are built on sloping sites and include terracing and magnificent views of the surrounding countryside. Both included beds of colourful plants on the bright autumn day when we visited them

However the Clays commissioned Henry Avray Tipping, who designed many famous gardens including that at his own house at High Glanau Manor nearby, to design Wyndcliffe in 1922 while Veddw House garden was created by the owners Anne Wareham and Charles Hawes in the 1990s.

The Clays owned Piercefield House near Chepstow and had made their money in banking and brewing. Wyndcliffe Court Garden enhances the large Arts and Craft style house designed by Eric Francis before WW1. The Clays were a social couple who were well known in the local community and we had the chance to admire the oak-panelled ballroom where we were served home-made cakes and sandwiches.

In contrast Veddw House Garden surrounds a small cottage probably built by a labourer who worked in the nearby wireworks or woodland. The building encroached on wasteland owned by the Duke of Beaufort who gave land to build a church and school at nearby Devauden in the 1840s to

Powys Castle and Gardens

By Rita White. Photos by Heather March

It was an early morning start from Dyffryn to Powys Castle and Gardens. The weather forecast was a bit iffy but everyone had a mac. or umbrella so no worries! As it turned out, they were not needed!

We stopped for a welcome coffee break at the delightful little Erwood Craft Station, situated in an old railway station not far from Builth Wells. Some of us managed to investigate the path that led down to the river, certainly a place to remember for another visit when we might have more time.

The road from here zigzagged and wove its way around the contours of the mountains until we had our first glimpse of this imposing medieval, Welsh (as opposed to English) castle standing aloft with a commanding view in all directions.

At first sight it looked as if it was built of red brick and it was not until later that I could see that it was in fact a wonderful red STONE.

We descended en bloc upon the restaurant, where we all enjoyed a good lunch before meeting our gardener who gave us a guided tour of the gardens.

We began on the layered terraces, yes, three of them, hewn into the rock, giving a fantastic view of the grounds, their balustrades topped with huge sculptures. They were stocked with herbaceous borders, climbing roses, clematis, wisteria etc., and specimen trees, with a view of the formal gardens below and, as far as the eye could see, the wonderful mid-Wales countryside with the skyline broken by mountains.

The Formal Garden is typically Edwardian, flat, rectangular areas of colour bounded by hedges and fruit trees. Beyond, and out of sight of the house we discovered the nursery and green houses, the heart of the garden you could say.

The gardeners are very eco-friendly and the first thing that I noticed was the display of solar panels! Then the rotational heaps!

We left our guide here and made our own way back to the castle, choosing to avoid all of those steps by taking the flatter route through the recreation area, where children were running around the flat, mown paths of a maze. Then to the lake, which I am sure, is a haven for wildlife. From here it was only a stones throw to the Museum, which was another surprise.

In what looked like an old keep, but had been in fact part of the residential area of the building, we discovered the benefit of the earl's generous act of handing over the Castle to the National Trust lock stock and barrel, with furniture and artefacts going back

All in all we had a full and enjoyable day, with perfect weather in spite of the warnings! I need hardly to add that the coach was very quiet on the journey home and our driver 'did not spare the horses' to get us back by 8.00pm.

Bowood House By Rita White

A recent visit to Bowood House and Gardens was a great success. The guided walk and talk through the private gardens followed by a delicious dinner prepared by the Marchioness of Landsdowne herself was appreciated by everyone.

Opposite is my photo of the beautiful organ as it has rather an interesting history. The organ at Bowood House

Chapel marked the completion of a study project into the work of the Trost organ building family who were active contemporaries of J. S. Bach in his native area of Thuringia. Built within an earlier chapel organ case, an organ was built based on documentary evidence dating from the period with Christopher Kent as consultant.
